Jackets with Real Animal Fur Sold As Faux Investigation Results: Fall/Winter 2007

Published December 19, 2007

Summary

In the fall and winter of 2007, investigators from The Humane Society of the United States (HSUS) purchased seven different styles of jackets—men’s, women’s, and children’s—that were advertised or labeled as faux fur, but actually contain real fur. The retailers involved are some of the largest and most well-known in the industry: Bloomingdale’s, Neiman Marcus, Lord & Taylor, Dillard’s, Saks Fifth Avenue and Yoox. The brands of jackets involved are Burberry, Andrew Marc, Marc New York, Preston & York, Aqua, Ramosport and Adam+Eve. The false advertising or mislabeling of a fur-trimmed garment is a violation of the federal Fur Products Labeling Act (FPLA). The HSUS identified the fur on the jackets as real by cutting open the lining of the trim to reveal skin, and then identified species using laboratory testing. In contrast, the hairs of fake fur contain a fabric or mesh backing. Last winter, The HSUS determined that a number of garments—many sold as faux—contained fur from members of the canid family, such as raccoon dog, domestic dog, and wolf.

Background

March 2007: Andrew Marc, Dillard’s, Lord & Taylor, Neiman Marcus, Macy’s, and seven other major retailers and designers were named by The HSUS in a petition filed before the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) seeking enforcement actions for violations of the FPLA. The petition remains pending before the FTC.

February 2007: The Dog and Cat Fur Prohibition Enforcement Act—H.R. 891—is introduced by Reps. Jim Moran (D-Va.) and Michael Ferguson (R-N.J.). The bill would ban raccoon dog fur and require full labeling for all garments trimmed with animal fur—closing the existing loophole. The bill remains pending before Congress.

Winter 2006-2007: The HSUS tests twenty-five fur-trimmed garments and finds that all are falsely advertised, falsely labeled, unlabeled, or a combination of problems. Twenty are identified by laboratory testing as raccoon dog and three as domestic dog.
